“Art does not reproduce the visible; rather, it makes visible.”

-Paul Klee

Why did you name the Gallery Time and Space?

When I asked Mrs.Renu George why the gallery was named Time and Space, I didn't expect the answer to unfold like a quiet autobiography.

The first name imagined for the gallery was Borrowed Time. It was conceived during a period of deep personal uncertainty, when health was fragile and the future felt precarious. In that vulnerable space, art became more than expression; it became refuge. It offered comfort, resilience, and a reason to endure. The gallery could not begin then, but something else did: healing. When the moment finally arrived to bring the gallery into being, life had steadied, health had returned, and perspective had expanded.

From that transformation, Time and Space was born.

To hear it explained is to understand that the name is spoken of not as a static place, but as a living journey. Through art, ideas take form and become real. Across eras, art has evolved alongside humanity, mirroring its rhythms, struggles, and hopes. Art exists within a timeframe and occupies space to create an ambience that holds an essence. The metaphysical aspects of Space express consciousness, light and love. The gallery embraces this and holds past, present, and future in a continuum. Shaped by shared experiences and collective growth and creativity, Time and Space transcends boundaries. Artists have not merely exhibited here; they have grown here. And in turn, the gallery has grown with them shaped by many hands, many minds, many moments.

Time once paused in borrowed breaths and Space expanded into thought and form between artists and the world of intertwined infinite and finite. Gallery Time and Space was never meant to be purely commercial. It has always been a community; alive with exhibitions, cultural conversations, live art performances, drama and music.

- Nagma Shaik

Art has a depth that goes beyond the merely superficial to a truth either psychological, spiritual or intangible and secret; this truth touches at a level that transcends intellectual understanding. A work of art shows the feelings of the artist; at the same time the artist's vision often has clarity unclouded by his own feeling. This detachment is a hallmark of good art where the seer and the seen are one and the artists capture them both in a holistic unity that surpasses their own part as an individual, carrying the work into the realm of universality.

The artist's vision is true in as much as it reveals the true nature of life whether romanticized or surreal or expressed as abstraction; perceived through an instinctive understanding that involves the conscious or subconscious levels of awareness. Art often uses the past as a sounding board in order to see if the artwork rings true, and turns to the Classical world where Idealism has always come to the fore and is the thread that renews and refreshes the imagination of the artist. In the modern era the very essence of life has come under scrutiny where so much Victorian baggage has been discarded and the freedom to choose for ourselves has become the norm. By an old Indian process of discarding every conditioned response and choosing freely we have come to understand the soul of the world in our own contemporary way as it resonates with our present day realities.

The material world- the world of body and mind however, give way to a source of love, and this prime mover of life reveals itself as the source of inspiration for the artist.

Therefore we come to the pinnacle of life where love compels to create and compels to destroy- untruth, and an order which is morally unacceptable.

When the artist creates with love the very subject lends its truth to him and gives him the ability to see and recreate its essence in an almost uncanny way; a form eminently suited to the subject and the objective of the exercise of creation.

Here it is that we may find equally exciting styles that use the maximization of input-perfectly realistic showing the subtlest of subtle nuances of the subject and using the most difficult and painstaking of techniques honed to a perfection that allows for justice to be done to dynamic narratives and to the telling light, the latter seen both as of physical and spiritual validity and as a moral device.

The minimization of input has been used by artists as a simpler, more immediate and spontaneous capturing of the fleeting and intense moment of experience and inspiration. In this chance and spontaneity, and the valued accident take precedence over meticulous planning.

All styles such as Classicism, Impressionism, Surrealism, Cubism, Dadaism, Expressionism are a means used by artists to express what they wished to do at given times which required a change and a paradigm shift in form that was unacceptable when it was first exhibited but later understood as a means of destroying the preconditioned mind of the viewer and shocking them into a new visual understanding that often underscored a different view of art.

The form delights even if the delight is in creating and viewing a perfectly horrific image. The form is often a take off from nature and yet acknowledging the ultimate mastery of nature and the artist's debt to this as the eternal source of his inspiration.

Art reveals its commitment to the world at a level that makes a human being from a woman/man.
